In Traditional Chinese Medicine, there are different basic principles which have been refined through thousands of years of practice. Amongst the essential tenets of health is the flow of life force throughout the body. Medical complaints are said to be triggered by disruptions to this particular flow, as the body's energy balance becomes disturbed. Practitioners of Conventional Chinese Medicine believe that disruptions in the flow of qi affect particular organs and thus; all indications could be associated and traced back to a particular organ.

Qi energy follows the meridians of the body, that are major pathways, as it flows all through the body. Each of the meridians carries qi energy to all of the organs. When an Acupressure practitioner diagnoses a problem, they know in particular which meridian is damaged. The meridians of the body are broken up into a detailed series of pressure points. These points are manipulated in a physical way to heal various indications. These pressure points are found by locating the meridian and making use of specific body parts as landmarks.

Typically, in an Acupressure session, the client lies upon a table draped with a sheet or blankets. Some Acupressure practitioners ask the customer to remove their clothes, while others work with dressed customers. When the session is blended with Western massage techniques, undressing is more common, even if, no massage therapist will ask the client to go past their comfort level. During the session, the practitioner usually takes a few quick passes over the customer so as to familiarize themselves with the customer, while asking concerning particular issues he or she is going through.

The Acupressure therapist then makes use of different degrees of pressure on particular pressure points on the body. Based on the requirements of the customer and the preferences of the practitioner, hands, elbows and likewise several tools could be used to be able to apply a certain amount of pressure. The flow of the client's qi is supposed to even out over the course of the treatment, and hopefully, relief is brought to the indications that the client has mentioned. These sessions can be extremely energizing and even therapeutic, normally the patient experiences a flood of emotion.
